Great photos but minimal prose.

Mate's book, Islands of Eden, is aptly named. Gentle introductions proceed segments of photos, segments that lead me as a reader to places I had never dreamed of visiting: St. Vincent and the Grenadines. And yes, now I want to go. In addition to what you would expect from a book of photographs from a renowned photographer--gorgeous photos that mimic a gourmet meal--Mate's words enchant and introduce. Simple and complex, his photos showcase the islands, the people, the food via color and perspective. Pictures of fruit and vegetables, vibrant with color, "pale" in the face of the joyful faces of the people themselves. Children and adults, photos impromptu and those more staged--all make me want to sit down and visit, laugh in chorus, and step up to dance. As striking as the photos of crystalline waters and eye-popping color-ridden natural vistas were, it was the faces of the people that inspire me. Ageless, from child faces onward, I fell in love. My favorite was one of a group of school children, girls and boys. A two-page spread, those five students spoke to my teacher heart. White uniform shirts nest below smiles and more somber faces, and a burst of pink flowers dangles amid the green, green leafy background. Were they on their way home from school? Or, were they still on the way? What did they learn and what did they write? Whose version of history and which scientific concepts took precedence? Stories upon stories reverberate from those faces, generational stories of what came before and anticipated tales of what lies ahead. Along the narrative way, Mate explains "liming" to readers, a concept that enchants me. Liming is hanging out, talking and laughing, dancing and connecting. It is informal, it is fun. We see it in neighborhoods around the world, neighborhoods where people connect. On the islands, liming leads to dancing, perhaps a few drinks, and--from what I can tell--connections. That liming resonates from my favorite photo. Perhaps that is the true gift that Mr. Mate gave to me this morning: Connection. His book led me to connect in my heart's core to people and islands I may never visit, but more importantly IMHO to the connection with all people of the world. That connection whispers and dances, one photo at a time, and inspires me to look for more books by him. And, that is the connection that will save us as a world community. Connections--one photo and one experience at a time.

Photographer Ferenc Mate provides stunningly colorful views of St. Vincent and the Grenadines. From aerial shots to close-up flora this is a delight to the eyes. You won't see any water color more spectacular (Fiji and the Seychelles are roughly equal). I'm ready to go. His commentary is about life for the locals- how they live, work, and eat. He recounts the happiness and friendliness of the people. Ferenc took a lot of photos of the locals and their food. He tells his experiences while filming and vacationing.

Boy, just when I was ready to pack up and move to Tuscany I received " Islands of Eden. " Wonderful book just oozing with humanity and goodness on every page, a warm and loving tribute to a people and a place seemingly unchanged since the world was young.
