Environmentalist DiPerna details the drama of one mother's fight to alert medical and political powers-that-be of the danger of two industrially contaminated wells. The wells were ultimately responsible for a "cluster" epidemic of some 26 leukemia cases and deaths. Using the story of Anne Anderson and her son Jimmy, DiPerna explores the difficulties inherent in such epidemiologic environmental investigations. She intertwines high-points of epidemiologic history and recent toxic waste incidents with current knowledge of carcinogenic action and toxic contamination. She calls for innovation and cooperation in environmental research. This book brings the issue of toxic waste to the reader's doorstep. For public health, environmental, and large public libraries.
